Share Our Differences and Celebrate Our Similarities

As a young motivational speaker, I am more than passionate about what I do. I am able to relate and capture the audience's attention with my topics and more importantly, every time I deliver a speech, I have a standing ovation because I know how to interact with the audience in a way that not many speakers can.

3 Takeaways

You are never too young to take action.

We are the change.

Resilience is the key

Bio

I was 12 years old in 2010 when a massive earthquake hit my homeland Haiti, where I lost everything. My best friend was killed before my eyes. My father, whom I had never met, then invited me to come and live with him in the U.S. Although this meant leaving my mother behind, I decided to go.

I started sixth grade in my new home, a girl with a weird accent and unfashionable clothes. I was teased mercilessly. Formerly a good student, I became a painfully shy child who refused to speak in class—even in math, which was my best subject. After a day of being bullied at school, I came home to a father I barely knew and couldn't confide in. By ninth grade, I had just about given up in my dreams for the future. But little did I know, public speaking was my way to prove to the bullies that my purpose in life is to Be Strong and resilient in moments of hardship. It turned my life around to the point that I have been speaking in front of thousand of individuals all over the United States.
